

4 competencies to develop global leaders

Jordi Canals, the dean of IESE, presents a framework to help companies develop tomorrow's global leadership with four key competencies for leaders.

July 28, 2014

Corporate strategy has evolved faster than leadership development in many global companies. This has created some management problems: companies may not have enough leaders in their growth markets or leaders with the required global competencies in their headquarters.

In his paper "Global Leadership Development, Strategic Alignment and CEOs' Commitment," IESE's Jordi Canals offers a conceptual framework to help companies create successful leadership initiatives. This framework is based upon global leadership development programs in many global companies.

Below, CEOs' five basic functions are defined according to Canals' framework, followed by the four key competencies for global leadership. Aligning leadership development initiatives to the firm's mission and strategy follows. Canals also stresses that CEOs' commitment is a key factor in making global leadership initiatives successful.

Five functions for global leaders

Understanding that global leaders, unlike domestic leaders, must address people worldwide, Canals ascertains that many of the tasks of CEOs are valid across cultures, divisible into five main functions:

1. Mission and meaning. CEOs must communicate what the company stands for and what its purpose is. This universal function of leadership is especially relevant to global organizations that need to unify various business units spread around the world.

2. Strategy. Global leaders need to develop a point of view about the future of the firm, one that can be clear, rational and that balances high expectations with the firm's capabilities. Strategic thinking means making choices -- and global leaders face more choices than domestic leaders. At stake is a long-term vision of how to compete and create economic and social value.

3. Execution. Leaders are action-oriented and are tasked with making things happen, according to the corporate strategy and underlying mission. Execution also involves organizational design: who does what and where, formal and informal incentive systems, and management control systems.

4. Integration. In global organizations, the integration of people from different backgrounds across businesses, functions and geographies is indispensable. CEOs need to help global firms come together and work together as a team. Understanding cultural differences and working with people from different countries is more important in global firms than in domestic ones.

5. Leadership development. Developing future leaders in a global organization can be particularly challenging, hence the focus of this paper. Future global leaders should be able to work across the world. Future global leaders should include those who are culturally savvy and with specialized knowledge in specific markets, away from headquarters.

Four competencies for global leaders

Canals asserts that leaders' competencies must map to the functions they carry out. Leadership development programs, he argues, should not forget that the main goal of learning and development is to improve the leaders' professional development and performance, in all functions they are engaged with.

Canals uses a framework with four major competencies required for global leaders.

1. Knowledge. This includes the information, notions, models and ideas that global leaders need to have or acquire. This includes models to understand the global world and become familiar with specific countries with different political, social and economic systems.

2. Capabilities. This includes problem analysis and synthesis, problem-solving, decision-making, action orientation, leadership, dealing with complexity/ambiguity and organizational design.

3. Interpersonal skills. Global leaders' interpersonal skills help leaders manage, engage and motivate people, and include, among others, fairness, respect, communication, team work, personal empathy, openness, cultural sensitivity and appreciation for diversity.

4. Attitudes. These are the personal traits that shape leaders' conduct and behavior and define the foundations of their relationships with others. Based upon classical virtues, Canals' model looks to integrity, humility, self-awareness, self-control, strength and temperance in leaders' attitudes.

Implications for global leadership initiatives

"Global leadership development is one of the top requirements for global companies' long-term success and should be high on the CEO's agenda," Canals writes. In fact, the success of global leadership initiatives depends upon CEOs' commitment, he says. That means that CEOs should not only be present in the programs, but they should also take an active role in designing and, eventually, assessing them. Top management helps ensure that all leadership development initiatives are aligned with the firm's mission, culture and strategy.

Managers often speak of business models and business model competition. In a similar vein, "we need to assume a model of global leadership that helps develop the competencies required by the company's strategy," says Canals.

www.iese.edu/insight